Show don't tell paragraph

As the giant bulb shattered onto the concrete floor, the lighthouse keeper felt sick to the pit of his stomach. What was he going to do? Sweat poured down his furrowed brow and his palms felt clammy as he clasped them together nervously. With wide eyes, he looked out over the pitch-black sea, towards the glaring light of the fast approaching ship. His heart skipped a beat when he thought about what might happen. Then suddenly he heard footsteps. Muffled whispers became increasingly louder and a gentle glow lit up the corridor becoming brighter as the precious seconds passed. Adrenaline coursed through his veins and he began to tremble just as the silhouette of a man appeared at the doorway, followed by another man, and another. They filed into the room, beaming as they patted him on the back and lined up against the observatory window. Tears pricked the lighthouse keeper's eyes and his hands ceased shaking as relief washed over him. The ship changed it's course and headed back out to sea.
